To Whom It May Concern,

I am writing in full support of Abdel's application for Leave to Remain in Ireland. I do so both as a private citizen and as the chairman of the Stradbally GAA football committee.

I first met Abdel last year when he rented a shed from a friend of mine in Stradbally and began using it as the base for his panel beating and general mechanic business. I got to know him better when he kindly offered to help me with the spraying of my campervan. Since then, I've witnessed firsthand the pride, dedication, and generosity that characterise Abdel's work and personality.

Abdel is extremely hardworking — often working in his shed until midnight, quietly focused on various projects. He is generous with his time and knowledge, always happy to help others and to share tools or advice when asked. He appears to be investing heavily in building a proper business, and he's quickly gaining a strong reputation locally for the quality of his work. He is never short of jobs, and word is spreading positively around Stradbally about both his skills and his work ethic.

But perhaps even more telling than his workmanship is Abdel's character. His shed is located beside a river, and when a pair of ducks showed up one day, he began feeding them. They now return every day, joined recently by a group of ducklings, and Abdel buys food especially for them. This kind of quiet kindness is typical of the man.

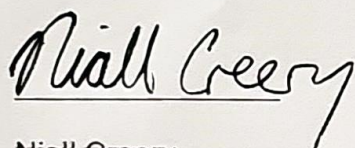

His shed has become something of a local hub — friends frequently stop by, and increasingly, Irish locals do too. It has become a small but meaningful space of social connection and community. I think that says a lot about the kind of person Abdel is.

He has recently joined the Stradbally Dads and Lads Gaelic football team and is hoping to make his debut in our match against Railyard on July 19th. Abdel brings a jovial spirit and a great sense of humour — he enjoys the craic and fits right in.

In our many conversations, it's clear that Abdel wants nothing more than to settle down in Laois, work with cars, and be part of the community here. I sincerely believe he has already made a strong start in doing just that.

I have no hesitation in recommending Abdel as someone who would continue to contribute positively to Irish society if granted the opportunity to remain. Please don't hesitate to contact me if further information is required.

Yours faithfully,
